Hongkoug has not for many years had the opportunity of hearing and enjoying such thoroughly perfect music as that given by the verious artistes on Thursday evening. The concert opened with a pianoforte solo by Mr. Hermann Morris, who, basides his solos in

Not only an abla accompanist, he showed in his duet with Mr. Lemmone and in his solos that he is a perfect master of all the resources of the instrument. Miss Bertha Rossow, the souranc of the company, followed the pianeforte solo with an exqui ite rendering of the selection from "Puritani," "Qui la voce." Miss Rossow possesses a very pure and fresh soprano of marrellous powers, of which she knows how to make the full use. Her phrasing and style are as delic to in nature as they are expressive, and her repention after her first solo showed how successfully she apnealed to her audience. Later in the evening, wiss Rossow gave two more solos, receiving on every occasion the most hearty recalls, to which she responded on one occasion with the insvitable "Comin' thro' the rye." CHAPTER XII.-Continued. The house next visited was of humble pretensions, and Sir Reginald cast a look of almost cynical displeasure as he noticed the mean surroundings. But within, everything spoke of comfort and of refined taste, if not of luxury. But Sir Reginald, who brought up the rear, almost staggered beneath the blinding shook of her to rise superior to the natural weakness of the discovery when he entered the studio and found himself in the presence of his wife!

The effect on Winifred, for it was she who was the young artist of promise, and whose picture ontitled "Highland Castle" Lord Polehampton had bought, was even more startling, though she was not wholly unprepared for the risks that she knew she ran of encountering Sir Reginald Denison. She clutched the bosom of her dress convolutely with her fincers in the offort to control the beating of her heart, which pale to the lips. "You are ill," said Lady Polehampton, in a gentle sympathising voice, who was in turn startled by the resemblance that Winifred bore to Claude Maclean's "Helen of Troy," but who suppressed her cariosity in her concern for Winifred's evident discomposure. "No, not ill," oried Winifred, making an heroic effort to recover from the agitation occasioned by the sudden appearance of her husband. "It is only pain. It rarely troub'es me-it will soon pass." And as she spoke, with a significant emphasis meant for her husband's ears alone, she darted a swift look full of meaning on Sir Re The incident ended quickly, and after the picture was examined and praised, it was with a igh of relief that Winifred saw her visitors de-"I think that will do for to-day," said Lad Polehampton, as they left the studio. "It nearly lunch time. Are you not coming with us. Reginald?" she asked, as the baronet stood hesitating on the pavement.

"If you will excuse me, I think I will walk. Selina. You may expect me to lunch, of course.' This with a polite bow and a meaning smil directed to Lady Isabel, which in a man of meaner birth would have been called a leer. Sir Reginald had made a discovery that surprised him, and he wanted time to think. He had not only met his wife unexpectedly after a lapse of nearly three years, but be had made the discovery that his wife and Claude's model, who had inspired him with such a strange longing that he was ready to throw himself at her feet, were one and the same person. It was a revelation, too, to find that his wife had blossomed into a woman of such extraordinary beauty. for he was constrained to acknowledge to himself that the picture had not flattered Winifred It seemed to him that it fell short of doing justice to her personal charms. Sir Reginald was too profound an idolater self to have any capacity for the divine passion, but he remembered that the nearest feeling to love he had ever known had been called up by soon grown cloyed by possession. But now that your beautiful face hovered near me, and this he beheld her in the ripe perfectness of her womanhood, and remembered how lightly he had let her go he was ready to curse his felly. nature it might have been thought that Sir of happiness is in your hands to fulfil or to de-Reginald had taken fire in a moment and fallen in love again with his own wife. - softly, as he trod the street with his jaunty head lay pillowed on his breast, whilst he kissed head lay pillowed on his breast, whilst he kissed her again and again. Helen of Troy is she P and that fellow Maclean is the lucky Paris, I suppose? Not if I know it. I must get her back by hook or by crook." Lady Polehampton found her brother an uninteresting companion at lunch that day. In reality Sir Reginald's thoughts were back at the shabby little house in Kensington, and he was scheming how he could escape Lady Polehampton's attention in order to return there, and how if once admitted within those walls he could prevail on his wife to return to him. But it is easier dropping stones into wells than getting them out again.

The only tinoture of bitterness in her cup was the sense of the hopeless passion for Claudo Maclean that had come to her unawares, and the struggle that it entailed to hide it within her own breast, and live her life as she must have lived it, if Fate had not brought them together. In her devotion to her art she had found a relief from the misery of had been crowned with new strength, enabling her sex.

The apher dress convulsively with her fingers, in the extent the blight that he had cast upon her life and the great bliss that might have been here throbbed wildly with excitement, and she turned but for that accidental meeting in the galleries of the Louvre years before, with all that followed upon that. She rebelled against the idea that her life was just what she had made it. She could not plead with herself that she had been reluctantly drawn into an unsuitable marriage. but, in some dim way, she felt that Life had not been just to her in leaving her in her youthful inexperience and guildess trustininess at the mercy of the first villain who chanced, in plausible guise, to cross her path. How terribly bitter it was! How weary of life she bad grown in a few short minutes!

But Winifred roused herself on hearing Claude's footsteps, and smiled her old sweet smile as she extended her hand in greeting. "I am so glad to see you, Mr. Macient, sue said. "It is nearly a fortnight since you were here; and I was feeling just now that the sight -FURNISHED. of a friendly face would be welcome."
